

Naval Vessel Protection Zones:

The U.S. Navy and Coast Guard are enforcing security zones around all U.S. Navy vessels. No vessel may come within 100 yards of a U.S. naval vessel, whether the naval vessel is underway or moored. Additionally, vessel must slow to minimum speed necessary to maintain steerage when coming within 500 yards of any U.S. naval vessel. These zones apply to the ports of Jacksonville, Canaveral, and Fernandina.

Local 100 yard security zones:

The U.S. Coast Guard is also enforcing security zones around all tank vessels, cruise ships, and military pre-positioned ships (MPS) in the ports of Jacksonville and Canaveral. No vessel may come within 100 yards of these ships, whether these ships are underway or moored.

Exceptions When Not Fully Activated

Fully Activated Security Zone: Depicted above is the security zone in the vicinity of Kennedy Space Center, Merritt Island, Florida, published at 33 CFR 165.701. This zone was activated on October 1, 2001 and will remain in effect until cancelled.

Pursuant to discussions between the U.S. Air Force, U.S. Coast Guard, and members of marine industry, including the fishing vessel community, certain exceptions to this zone have been created for those periods when full activation of the zone is not necessary. These exceptions are as follows:

Off Shore: Commercial vessels will be allowed to shrimp at a distance of 1 and ½ mile from the shore, during daylight hours only. This area is outlined in pink above.

Canaveral Bight: The Canaveral Bight area will be open to all traffic until 14 Feb 2002. On that date, the area will no longer be open to recreational boating traffic and all fishing vessels must move 1 and ½ miles offshore. The Canaveral Bight is outlined in green.

Haulover West: The area west of Haulover canal, and south of the Intracoastal Waterway, will be open to all traffic. This area is outlined in purple.

Haulover East: The area east of the Haulover Canal, and south to a line from the tracking tower, west to the wildlife management boat ramp, will be open during daylight hours only to all appropriate (shallow water) vessel traffic. This area is outlined in teal green.
